Online Master of Business Administration

The Master of Business Administration program at the UW-Whitewater College of Business and Economics develops aspiring professionals who are capable of thinking globally, behaving ethically and leading innovation. This three-pronged orientation is evident in the content of every MBA core class, in teaching methods and assigned activities.

You will have opportunities to practice using critical thinking skills as you make strategic decisions in cases and projects. You will learn to negotiate and persuade while you develop your skills in project management. You will assess your own behavior and improve your ability to work in teams. You will be a leader.

What would you do with this degree?

Career outcomes for MBA students — particularly salaries — vary greatly based on years of experience, geographic location, employment status and position prior to starting the program, as well as MBA emphasis and other factors.

Seventy percent of responding business school alumni rate the value of their graduate management education as outstanding or excellent. A professionally rewarding experience is the primary driver of overall value of a graduate management education.

Ninety percent of alumni say they would still pursue a graduate management education again knowing what they know now. A financially rewarding experience is the primary driver of alumni's retrospective decision.
