The Annette and Dale Schuh Visiting Artist Endowment brings professional artist/s to the UW-Whitewater campus each year. The course provides the opportunity for students to work directly with the artist(s) on a creative project or activity, the subject which is driven by the artists' oeuvre. The artist invited by and paired with a faculty or academic staff person who makes pedagogical connections between the artist's oeuvre and the learning needs of Art and Design students. Topics vary. Meetings outside the scope of the project may be required.

This online asynchronous course is designed for students who wish to critically consider the developmental science that has informed policy and program development; the social, political, and economic forces that have shaped the study of young children and contributed to developmental trajectories that benefit some children while disadvantaging others; the changing roles of families; and the implications of these issues for policies affecting young children. In the United States, a national consensus supporting policies and programs that promote the well-being and educational access of young children is talking hold. Many Americans are aware of the critical importance of the first five years of life and recognize that desired development outcomes can be derailed by social, political, and economic circumstances, such as poverty, racism, and inequity of opportunity. This course examines three important questions related to these complex intersecting issues, specifically: What are the historical antecedents and intellectual traditions that have shaped the study of child development in the U.S., a society riven with inequality? What is achieved developmentally during the first five years of life that have contributed to our understanding of this period's importance as a public investment? What are the factors that can derail optimal early development and increase developmental and educational disparities?

This online course will introduce students to the impacts of water pollution on aquatic organisms and human health. It is a collaborative course, taught by faculty from three campuses (UWW, UWLAX, UWM). Students will be provided a general overview of sources, transport, fate, bioaccumulation, and toxicity of water pollutants, including legacy contaminants and emerging contaminants of concern. Students will gain an understanding of the principles of toxicity testing and how effects may be examined at different levels of biological organization (molecular to ecosystem level). Students will also learn how toxicity data can be used to regulate and reduce water pollution.

Depicting the worlds of royalty nobility and peasantry on screen not only tells stories about the past but reveals the attitudes priorities and cultures of the filmmakers age. Our course will study films on subjects from the late medieval to Revolutionary eras to address questions about historical and modern cultures: how did men and women interact; how was power legitimized and wielded; how did commoners navigate a rigidly hierarchical world? And how do our imaginations of past gender class and power relations reflect contemporary realities?

Maritime archaeologists use the information from shipwrecks submerged settlements cargo deposits wharves and other shoreline sites to piece together a story about the people who sailed the ships built them loaded their cargo and much more. In doing so we give a voice to the often undocumented silent majority: the sailors laborers passengers and shipwrights who speak to us only through the artifacts they left behind. This class will introduce the field of maritime archaeology including its history procedures and the information we can learn from both a sunken vessel and the artifact assemblages from a maritime site. In looking at examples from excavations throughout the world we will discover more details about those storybook images of shipwrecks pirates and seafarers and understand how to better interpret what they have left for us to find.

Why was Paris a creative haven for expatriate writers, artists, and musicians? What prompted these artists to leave their homes, and why did Paris provide such a fertile environment? After a historical overview of Parisian history, we will focus on artistic/literary movements associated with expatriates, such as the Lost Generation (Hemingway, Fitzgerald, Stein, and others) as well as African-American writers (Baldwin, Wright, Himes, and Hughes) and discuss current issues. We will also learn some traveler's French.

The purpose of this course is to provide students with an opportunity to explore the evolution and development of law, particularly crime and punishment, in a cross-cultural context. Specifically, we will examine legal and government institutions that regulate crime and punishment policy in three common law countries: England, Scotland, and Ireland. A portion of the class will be conducted at the UW-Whitewater campus and the remaining portions will be taught in Dublin, London, and Edinburgh.

This seminar gives students an opportunity to conduct qualitative sociological research as part of a team investigating diversity and inclusion on the UW-Whitewater campus. Students will conduct in-depth interviews to investigate the meanings that members of the campus community give to diversity and inclusion on campus. Students will also conduct observational fieldwork to document interactions that take place in public areas on campus and analyze these interactions in relation to diversity and inclusion. The seminar is designed to deepen students' knowledge of the process of conducting social scientific research.
